

LOG ONE.

Why that man did those things, is an answer reliant on only true humanity the polymaths daydreamed about. The emphasis on searching is futile, because it's only found within the impossible fractions of one's impulse and complex. "Lazy", your Revolution of Dignity has inspired the numb world. It may have not been in the way you imagined, but it's what you deserved. I have no other choice, but to elucidate to all who sees this – to all must I tell – of everything you've done. Broken, broken man.

December 21st.

(placeholder for illustration of Lazy in Lazy's Haven)

It's been a clever eight years since we lost our way! Psshh, big deal – that's why it's our human nature to adapt! Well, albeit you heard this before, of course you have.

I just wanted to reiterate how important this is; the technological upbringing of yesterday had indeed spurred a “Raised Floor” dilemma within the planets. Prompting an obvious need to adapt likewise to our ancestors. Unfortunately, I too, was a victim of this dilemma. It may be hard to conceptualize me, your host – the one responsible for enlisting you with adaptation – to be the very one to struggle with it.

But I concur it is not a false statement.

Of course I struggled alongside everyone else, as nothing is given to you like a perfectly acute slice of key-lime pie topped with bobble trims of elevating whipped cream. I know I struggled, I had to have struggled to get to this very predicament of my life. I consider this indefinite struggle to be my luxury!

Look around the artwork of my Haven! I suppose I'll give you a tour!

Oh how my spirit resonates with those void-filled plethora of boxes sat down like a royal fatman within my box shop. Oh how my prefrontal cortex salivates at that rightward door. Soon enough, I'll end up voyaging to the other side, and for some illegitimate reason – my puerile prefrontal cortex believes I, Lazy S Vestis, will be going upwards towards the sky!

I certainly cannot forget that locker that sits right under those odd pipes. You may ask, "It's just a plain locker!", but unbeknownst to you, I built it myself! You see, If you adhere to my refutations of adaptation, you too can build conveniences such as lockers! However you cannot build key-lime pie, as lamenting as it is. Oh goodness! My noggin failed to make the connection that I built my shed too! From the Amazon of salvaged metal roofs I raised my squared hut from the ground. I'll admit, it's a great addition for spatial convenience. Living in an alleyway is quite bothersome for my shoulders, so it's great that I've adapted to solve such stress!

Finishing off the arts of my Haven, we have my most prized possession, the garden! I honestly can't seem to fathom when I planted this foliage, or even – what exactly these plants are.

All I know is that for some reason, I feel a hearty existence hailing down on my spirit whenever I'm near the garden. I mean it's a largely normal garden: the unknown botanical greens of it pose like no other plant, and they convert energy into a carbohydrate as to be expected. Yet it all feels too familiar, like it was something I grew up with as an infant, just to forget it during adolescence. Always sticking in the dead-end trails of my head, blowing me kisses of its familiarity from light-years away. Sometimes it speaks to me! I hope from the bottom of my insolent heart to meet this broadening closeness in mortem.

Oh I apologize! It seems I got too lost in my lovely Haven, and I was just whining on the fact the narrowness harms my shoulders.

I figure it's time to start our exorbitant competition! We have a daunting destiny looking at each and every one of you perpendicular fellows, they want you to adapt; they want you to understand the world. Bring us back to, to.. A world that ceased its – “Raised Floor” Dilemma! Yes!

Now, listen with more than just your ears as I pace around the Haven.

See, you were always meant to fight, fighting is a second nature right behind breathing. Whether you'd been fighting off the common cold, wrestling it out with a sibling or acquaintance, punching off the grief you feel of losing your parents, or pulverizing yourself.

The AP through his creative cathedrals had made this world one where humans must embrace their brave efforts of suicide as means of shaping this world to allow for people to interlock with their dreams. Atleast, that's what I believe, I don't mean to impose my spirituality on you. Do what you want of course.

But we, naturally, took his thoughts in an illiterate manner.

We fight for our own means, our wants and not our needs.

I've begun to see how our social environment has changed throughout this age of darkness. I digress that in a few years we'll fuse with our wantful fighting, a large portion of us would have committed a philosophical incest.

So let's do it, let's be idiots, let's commit such an internal taboo and fight in vain. Yes, to adapt is to hold on to meaningless hope in a lustful word! For your first task I impose thee to have a scrap of yoursness!

Oh! Who is that, standing next to me? Its friendly-face OSHAGRODA! How could I forget about this round's angelic coordinator? You white faced, beautiful you.

(Insert illustration of Lazy and Oshagroda on the other side of the alleyway, where the haven begins to break into a black and white geometric mess.)

“It's not a thing to fret at all, Lazy.”

Oh how I appreciate those kind words from you Oshagroda – well, individuals of adaptation! Listen once again with not just your ears! For your location and opponent will be dictated by Oshagroda! Take it away Osha! “Now as you KNOW!?”

KNOW KNOW KNOW KNOW KNOW

“How could we know of anything if we let ourselves go.”

This man, “Lazy”, is the largest observation of this claim.

Broken, broken man.

“Andrew Jackson”

He died without much regrets,
Only deplored by his wrath,
That he could never serve his righteousness to his foes,

He was the common man,
And the common man revered him,
And the common man treated him to their veneration,

Power’s intimacy with Jackson,
Strong statements allowed him to inflate,
Inflate allowed him to look over the common man,
The country’s vulnerable to a national putrefaction he says,
So naturally Jackson saves with his inflate,
by forgetting the humanity of cherokee roses,
And making more room for the common man,

Jackson was a common man,
And he helped the common man,
You just need to drown out the noise.

If you gave this man a towel he would fecklessly place it on some table and make no cerebrate of it. In this case, time acts as the forgotten towel. Broken, broken man.

December 22nd.

[Placeholder for illustration of Lazy in a not-so-comfortable bed, he looks bewildered.]

Huh? Well – that’s completely absurd!

One minute I’m talking with my great friend, and the next I’m comfortably resting like a bear in my shed! I figured I’d start to head out to see any shocking developments, to my dismay my legs crumbled to the floor. As to be expected, everyone has this issue if you attempt to go against the force of your sleep inertia! Nonetheless, I garnered back my bearings and stepped out of my makeshift shed.

Hoo, it seems the speckle of daylight that poured out from the holes of the roof had disappeared. I never mentioned this towards the players, admittedly this roof is unambiguously the highest point of interest! It’s like swiss cheese, with noodles of wire pouring out its swissy falls.

I just always found it rather odd, I mean yes– I’m aware– it’s been quite some time since the world went numb, but paradoxically, the infrastructure shouldn’t be giving up so soon. Before darkness they managed to manipulate the periodic table to their likings, any element or alkali could be as durable as we wanted it to be! They promptly chose Tungsten, since it was already adamantite to begin with. We began calling it tungstenite, it had a ring to it the upper authorities scrutinized! It was so..

..

As mentioned before, it’s odd this infrastructure is failing with not a smidge of tarnish!. Multiple swissy holes and their falls of spaghetti. so much reliance on tech it made us stumble in our heads on how to fabricate roofs?

The sight of this roof makes me spiteful.

As I bounce my eyes around the Haven I have come to a steady observation, It is quite dark in here!

I don’t find this moonlight pleasurable, since at the raven hour – I don’t get to see the colors that would otherwise be seducing my retinas. Our eyes simply aren’t as equipped for such darkness like other species. That’s why many fears come from it, prejudice, as well in some cases. We did get flying cars, 'Plautars.' – named after this man, Gravestein Plautus.

I distinctly remember when I was in education, specifically in my literature classes, they only read old tales: Paul Bunyan, The Cat in The Hat, Little House in The Prairie. I can't name much, they were all so forgettable, but not for its writing – but for my intuition that circled it with immeasurable speed. I always had this unnerving feeling about them, that something wasn't being told. That it simply was pseudo. I don't ever remember reading anything recent, at least, before we lost our way. It's like Pandora's Box was emphatically let loose, it let me see how much we ignored things!

We solved the hunger crisis, quite early on. 1966, actually. Read up on that in year 4 of my adaptation! That's all it said, never explained how it was accomplished. If I was born 50 years before I'd spit at them until they explained such a miracle. You always need to find an answer. That's the basis of adaptation, you can't find it?-- then create one until it suffices!

That's why I don't like the moonlight because the colors are always so loud! Without the noise I get stuck in my head!

Light is good, dark is bad, things they would say in whispers, sometimes with sayings like these that seemed less nuanced than what it truly was. The world groomed the ones who kept those words.

As I say this, it seems something bright, almost divine – no, a fully divine light is starting to contrast with the blackness of the swiss cheese roof!

“Lazy, is that you?”. A voice calls out, it's coming from the effulgence, drawing just enough out the cheese hole that I could see its beauty – I was wondering where he was!

[Placeholder for illustration where Lazy's back is turned to us and the most focused; He's staring at Oshagroda who is sinisterly lurking inside one of the holes in the roof, Lazy radiates.]

“Oshagroda! What are you doing lurking within the Swiss roof?” I call out to him, I expand my arms out wide, sometimes I wish I could hug his light. “How did everything go with the players? Please enlighten me that all is well, I profoundly apologize for whatever route in my destiny that induced me in forgetting time.” I ask triumphantly.

“All is well.” Oshagroda responds without wasting a second. I giddy like a tiny cyrillic girl, “Oh you don’t know how much I value those words!” Osha’s brightness dims a bit, only half of his cherubim elucidative state is even visible in the hole he creeps in, he’s being distant. How idiosyncratic! “You must correct something.” Resolute Osha like it’s been on his mind for eons, his face is fuzzy.

Now, you typically rivet on about what you’re about to say to the person in front of you – at least I hope you do. There’s things who speak confidently without a thought, as everything is initiated by their programming, the thought of it sounds heretical – to accuse Osha of such a thing. I don’t mean to disrespect Osha, I never would.

The Haven dances, by the way.

Whenever something’s off its status quo, I always imagine my prefrontal cortex as a little Greek boy who looks away whenever he’s scared, or really – when he gives up.

As I’ve so callously adapted – I’ve gotten keen to the atmosphere of my environment. Right now it’s as still as a windsock before a mighty storm; the haven isn’t dancing like it usually is. I think I’m of same mind as that little Greek boy.

“Pardon,” I say. “I don’t know what you mean!” Oshagroda remains half-ly clenched in that swiss hole of the roof, I think he scurried a little further in. I shouldn’t doubt whatever he needs from me.

“Having to see it any longer makes me spiteful, Lazy,” His words are backing my prefrontal cortex in a further corner. I’ve never done anything to upset him before, as far as I can remember at least. The haven is hardly swaying around, as if it’s making room for Osha’s godly lecture.

“I helped you set up this haven, to give yourself something real, something you could admire with all your senses, to allow for the gifting of your touch to someone who truly needs it.” Oshagroda exclaims with a little spice in his words at the end. I start to join my haven in its stillness. Now it’s occurred to me,

I’ve done something wrong indeed.

Needless to say, I will not doubt whatever chore I must do.

“I do really appreciate that Osha, you’ve blessed me in ways I could never surmise to mimic!” I gratefully state, hoping I could ease that drying paprika in his cadence – hoping I could make my punishment feel better.

“So then why would you ostracize me by cultivating those pseudo-plants of nil.” Osha peers into my being. It’s intimidating, it makes my arteries anxious. It feels a little harder to live. What would you do if you were in the disenchantment of a god who looms so much more over the ant that is yourself? You should listen, you should always listen – to Osha.

The rattling of my anxious arteries challenged Osha’s chide, I only caught wind of that first half.

It’s always a little hard to understand Osha’s body language, his eyes never close, fixed as white circles with an even whiter mouth. No eyebrows, no nose, no folds. I’ve never been one to judge, people come in all equations which has only enhanced my belief we’re all capable of the same things. Considering that, there still is an outlier in his only outlier one man o-ntourage. Osha is that outlier.

With what he said, and that look, and his lovely presence, it would make sense I ostracized him. An omniscient being like him holds my energy. Everything here is real. This roof is real, and I have feelings towards it. I have bad feelings towards this roof for whatever reason. He must be weary of that disdain.

I can't adapt by being ignorant to the world. So with these thoughts I mutter, just enough he could mouth my repentance: "I'm sorry about my feelings towards the roof." "LAZY," he roars. "Stop your ignorance and look at what's in front of you." From where I'm standing, weakly peering back at Osha creeping in the swissy roof, the only thing in front of me is the unknown botany trees. Oh, the Havens' dancing again! It's that familiarity to blame! it crushes me so yet it never was a bother. "Oh! The garden!" It makes the utmost sense that something needs correction! How can I cultivate these plants without knowing what they are? What have I been providing myself with this whole time? "Now I see what needs correcting," I saw with a bold expression tatted on my face, I grin towards the swissy hole he creeps in. "Thank you Osha." Osha at first remains stationary, yet slowly but surely I could make out a basic replying grin from him! I made the right decision! Ha-ha! The haven dances and so do I, the sink beside me captures a faint reflection of this moment. Dancing in that tight spot between my shed and garden makes it extremely awkward, I admit.

“Great, so do what must be done.” His fast responses fail to fade, the havens dancing, im dancing, there is no issue!

“Surely I will,” I respond, kneeling down at the unknown plants, when inspecting them up close it reminds me that I never tried to admire them. We co-exist with it without pressure, no complaints, yet we also stomp on them unknowingly. We do that enough times and the plants stomp us back. I would never want to stomp on the plant, same words of mine given to the contestants, I’d want to be kissed by it when I die.

“So, Osha, you never told me you were a botanist. I mean it makes sense you would be – I too have been wondering what type of plants these are,” I flutter the asymmetrical leaves of the unknown plants, trying to make them shake around. “They don’t have the ability to dance like everything else does, perhaps that’s why it’s bound to only speak of camaraderie to me. These plants know you gave me the ability to dance.” As I finish my sentence I frown at my own observation, yet at the same time I can’t nag off my sympathy for these plants. It’s as if I’d want to see their growth regardless of dissonance.

And now it’s quiet. How odd, no timed responses.

I excitedly bring my head up to glance at the swiss hole; I face a little whiplash from how ineptly I raised my head.
Oshagroda isn't creeping up there any longer, it's left how it was again; spaghetti noodles out the swissy falls.

And it's still dark out here.

In fact, it's getting darker.

Im blind and the only thing I can see is sparkles jumping.

Eye monsters.

Within this moment of deserving darkness I felt a great sin was committed by a part of me, with the other part not in tangent with that very sin.

“Your Vi Datum, Lazy.”

[placeholder for illustration of an anxious but-trying-to-hide it Lazy in complete darkness with Osha's radiant glow behind him]

A much closer, harsher voice slivers its tone at me. I look away from its sound, to the wall of the darkened Haven.

My pop used to own a vest, it's actually the one slouching above the garden. The leather looks loose, like a german-shepard's toy. It's hard to say if My pop loved that vest because of that. My prefrontal cortex wanted to keep it. I'll permit that putting it near the earth isn't the most convenient area, but in such a shoulder-excluding environment I don't have any other options!

The desiderium of my pop is fuzzy now but its no matter. Pop challenged my own beliefs a lot. No, he didn't actually. He was like a troll! A troll who stared at you as if you're under them. He never listened to anything I told him, or even his own words. Like everyone else they just cruised their entire lives, and eventually something has to happen. 'Poor', some interesting folks called my pop by that term, pretty odd – we were like a sturdy bridge with our money. Well, that voice reminded me of him and his vest; he never argued against them but always had something sharp in his mind – he had to have had something.

I'd want there to be a version of him where I heard his side of things, one who also listens to me. An orb of authority!

"You made your conditions, Lazy." I'm still temporarily blinded. Indeed that harsh voice is Osha's. I don't dare to say anything back. I can't. "Residing in your thoughts to clog out my words does not suffice," I don't dare to say anything back. "You are quite fond of everything I told you, about those plants, of its nothingness,” I like those plants. Makes me feel like a chummy Greek boy again! “I can tell you disagree.” The great thing about the truth is you don’t have to say anything. My pops body language taught me that.

It’s just getting darker. My body isn’t in favor of it, it feels almost autonomous. “Everything here dances because it’s real, you noticed the plants don’t dance.” I don’t dare to say anything back. When you’re not allowed in a pub they kick you out, if you don’t comply they start to get physical. I like to think that’s how my body is retaliating against this darkness, against me. Tire meets its roped truck pulling it out its hearth. “The conditions of your Vi Datum ensured you could see everything for what it was,” The face says. “This is what you wanted is it not? I don’t believe you’d want to have it any different.” I close my eyes as not even the darkness can be a curtain to Osha’s light. I just can’t say anything back, well sometimes I don’t need words. That’s how it is with adapting. No one can make me say otherwise, literally!

“I value this reality Lazy, it should be crucial you do too, to save the world like you said.” Osha grins his mirror reflecting grin, I can't oppose looking at it. "You need to destroy that garden." He ushers.

I don't have a clue of how or when I set this garden up, or even the plants in there. I've always been fond of its warmth, it's so familiar, and I know it can't dance. I know its flaws, I adapted to know it. It speaks to me in a soft whisper only deaf kids could hear. I'd be a murderer for destroying it.

"The garden is unreal." I'm told.

Osha looks at me like a concerned Carolinian Chickadee. I hate not seeing the truth in things oh so much, in fact I'd use my chopsticks of abhorrence everyone saves for special occasions to compress this fake reality's neck, until cartoonish and most likely censored organelles spin out like a running sparkler. It's not real, so it doesn't matter. That's why I hate it so much. It just serves to make fun of my own progress. Osha's words are sharper than anyone else's

However, I just don't know if he's defining the garden properly. Unreality, ergbb, it's a stain on anything.

I take a quick gander in the bleakness at the faint shape of the unknown verdance and swing back at Osha's light I can't comprehend to ever have. However, respectfully of course, I must be the garden's defense attorney. If I'm wrong I'd like to know how.

"How is it unreal?" I ask, the very word is shouted out unintendedly.

"It looks like a kid's drawing, there's no blooms, the stems don't have any proper direction, and the only thing that kid got right was imitating the rows of cultivation." Osha proceeds with his case, so naturally I state mine.

"That garden," I throw my arm out to point somewhere close to the garden; it is still completely dark and I have no idea what I'm pointing at. "It may not dance but it speaks to me! Oh it makes things so familiar, that's why it's not a lie!" I bark at Osha. I'm trying to seem more open minded, like a prey negotiating with its predator – with the only difference is I don't know what comes next regardless of the outcome.

It's less defined when things are further away from me, now that Osha is up close I can see him once more. His appearance at me is questionable, am i a pity to him or am i simply misguided? This continuous stare that's being held amongst this anti-color is throwing me in a trance.

“I see where some of your discomfort in destroying the garden is coming from, as it does its job in inducing you to fall into its sharp, deceitful cavity. Lies can carry sound; that is exactly what you’re hearing.” Osha states as if he’s repeating himself. We enter that staredown once more, this time it feels less on-edge, like he actually wants to listen to what I’m saying. How grateful I am of this! Getting through a higher-being is absolutely absurd! Ha! And yet I can’t shake off my body’s disagreement.

“How is it imitating reality? It’s very possible it could lie but that isn’t challenging me! I’ve had to deal with lies, that’s the only reason why I hate, why i loathe unreality. Those lies have to be irrefutable proof of its realness! I don’t doubt why you think this way, Osha, but I am a firsthand account of its reality!” I carry my words out with a little more confidence.

My body jerks forward horribly like a glacier’s sudden crack.

“Are you mad at me?” I asked Osha, I seemed to have lost all that confidence. It’s like my body is trying to make a statement here.

“I don't get mad, I simply just need a greater way of informing oneself of the truth. It's obvious you're still undergoing your condition in the Vi Datum.”

I don't think he wants to debate anymore. When a planet gets too indulged in a mighty star it starts to forget what it was receiving.

My arms reach out in front of him like a bluntly adjusted straw – they do it, not me.

He's probably forgotten everything I said to him. You're supposed to want an answer, the only way to adapt is to find an answer. So if someone like Osha does not grant me it, should I not receive it at all?

[Placeholder for illustration of Lazy's arms awkwardly reaching out for Osha, boasting the darkness and Lazy in his bright face. Lazy has a complex expression.]

“You are well adapted, this is true, quite disciplined. Reality is still a new thing for you, I apologize for making you think the wrong thoughts,” Osha's light burns on me, not enough to hurt, but enough to acknowledge his words. It is so odd talking with someone of a higher nature, he knows and I don't. It would require me to redefine my own pillars of ideology.

This doesn't make sense, I would have done that long ago. I know I met Osha way before.

–No I wouldn't, it's only been 2 days since I did that thing.

I am not stable and Osha knows that, at least with my perception of this new reality.

I get to learn how defensive I get when I'm wrong, and I'm lucky to have enough self control to not expose that to Osha.

How egotistical, it makes me think of the roof. Do I think I could have done a better job in its creation?

Things just fail and you need to adapt to realize that.

Osha's right. I'm just not thinking properly. Heretics.

The Broken, broken man is not making the right discovery.

“Additonally, you are your body and your mind. You can probably tell by now with your unsolicited gestures. When such a strong disconnect is dividing their confluence, one rebels. Your mind is the puberty sky whilst your body is the static earth, no matter how the earth is perceived it is mostly fastened in its position. The sky however, despite how much it can influence its earth, is not fastened. It can change, it could even grow to correspond with the earth – giving humans that lush Amazon they told you about when you were a kid. So in striking times like these, let your body make the decision. It grows wise from its enticing atmosphere. A volcano is erupting and neither you nor the sky can stop it.”

Osha’s monologue finishes, it feels like something he’s been wanting to tell me for a while. My body is simply the other part, I’m always in its skin but am I ever listening to it? Just now I witnessed myself flip tails with my belief on the garden, it is in fact unreal. No, I may not know how – No, I don’t deserve some answer. That’s really the beauty of adaptation, you learn you’re smaller and more realistic than what’s expected.

My mind is not more than my body, my beliefs are under Osha’s. If he says I had the wrong thoughts, I have the wrong thoughts.

How self absorbed I am.

It reminds me of the swissy roof! How could I ever know how sturdy that truly was, am I not considering its workers? Am I letting that generalize how I perceive everything else?

My prefrontal cortex is looking for an answer it's not getting, therefore; it's spiteful. How pitiful.

There's many types of dances that could sum up reality, that's why the Haven dances, the boxes have an uneven routine, they'll slide to the left three times and then towards the right only twice. The ac units hung up like portraits beside my shed weirdly thrust themselves in and out. I'm no dance judge but that's the thing, the dances are interpreted differently making it imperfect no matter what! It gives meaning to everything going on! Nuance!

Everything lights up just a smidge.

"So with that in mind, Lazy, do you know how to let your body speak without it being muffled by your mind?" My hand folded into a fist by his question, they're ready.

"Teach me" I ask of him, softly. I know my place now.

"Just stop thinking." the all-mighty emperor in its robe of low interpretation explains to me.

[placeholder for illustration of a close up image of Lazy's face, making the same pose and facial expression as Lucifer.]

“On the evening of that first day of the week, when the disciples were together, with the doors locked for fear of the Jewish leaders, Jesus came and stood among them and said, “Peace be with you!””

Lazy stands leaning over his shoes, as if he himself was a sock being filled in. He's ignited back up with his hands clasped together, as a way of announcing how binded his body is.

His haven remains in an uncomfortable subdued light, sunlight already loses weight when reaching for the Haven. So the result of its absence is impactful.

Yet in that embrowned thickness, Oshagroda glows a glow more flamboyant than the absent sun. A star kills what can't be seen and now the Haven is entirely visible, dancing along the vibrations of the bouncing light.

Natheless, Lazy legs begin stomping over the manmade gaps of the floor, his struts pronounce these cracks even more.

The face smiles like a proud father, like his son is taking his first steps. The mood is to be interpreted.

These steps allow Lazy to be right up close to Osha, like Mercury to the Sun.

"We have grossly wasted time, but it's not a bother. Since you did get something out of it," Oshagroda says, Lazy looks at him with a less domesticity. “I need you to grab that shovel from your manmade locker.” Commanded Oshagroda, there is not a front from Lazy, he obliges in equilibrium.

Lazy moves with all his feelings towards this contradiction of unreality. His body is used as support in his new found humility.

It isn't a long pace, 5 awkwardly spaced steps from Lazy brings him uncomfortably close to his flawed locker. Osha watches from behind in an amalgamic expression as it is shared by Lazy as well. A footsoldier, one who really tried, is the face that unifies them. That's what the footsoldier thought as he was shot down.

Lazy's sharply angled hands poke at the lockers handle and with no time to spare it opens. There isn't any passcode, if there was – it wouldn't have worked anyway. Inside is a tarnished shovel, with its end dulled and the wood grip splinted. It barely fits in that box. Did Lazy ever try? As a result of this, Lazy grips the shovel, no – he doesn't attempt to gently nudge it outward, rather he uses the strength bestowed upon him by whatever he's believing at this moment to tear the shovel out of the lockers ovary.

Lazy is sent backward due to the centrifugal force. His head and upper body scrape the floor as the cracks make divots in his skin, like little leeches. Lazy ended up landing right in front of Oshagroda, who stared at him with no face.

“Give yourself that last bit of reality you need, Lazy,” Lazy pushes himself back up, trailing human red puss coming from the little divots. “Use that shovel and destroy the plants of nil, lay everything on it. Abide by your transition.”

Lazy nods at Osha’s insightful instructions. He takes another awkwardly spaced 5 steps to the garden and raises that ironic shovel up over his head.

“This is what you want.” Assures Oshagroda.

[placeholder for illustration of a down shot perspective with the garden focused up front and an uncanny looking Lazy with a shovel with Osha further in the back.]

Lazy aims what he believes is his righteous shovel towards the stems of the unripe flowers. They would’ve been pale-leaved sunflowers. His father’s favorite. With how barbaric Lazy struck the flowers it sends its scarce water all over the place. As an ending speech the garden sends the droplets in his eyes.

Lazy does not dare open them.

So he continues to strike, he doesn't think of where, or why.

Lazy's spirit is what's striking it, thinking it's for the best.

Dirt flies, as well as the life in it. The sink gets filled with dirt, the vest gets covered in it, it splashes on the walls, and stains Lazy's attire. Lazy's aimless onslaught prompts him to misdirect his hits towards the ground, sending huge shocks up his arms and dulling the shovel more. He doesn't stop, and he never stops. The pale-leaved sunflowers are gored, there's holes where dirt used to be, and critters crawl all over. Additionally, it seemed Lazy was growing carrots and lettuce, he did not destroy them – they were already in the process of wilting away.

There's only a few more strikes left in him, each one a louder punch to himself as he grunts all his air out. With his eyes closed, as the finale of this entire mess, he misses the garden and the force cracks the wooden grip right off.

Lazy finally passes out, dirtied by his ideology.

His body got what it wanted.

His Vi Datum is now solidified.

Who is he now?